The General Assembly of 1619

Directions:
- Copy the template below, front to back, onto 8½ x 11” white or colored paper so that the title “The General Assembly 1619” is at the top, upside down, and the 3 groups are on the reverse side, at the bottom of the page.
- Students fold the three groups – governor, governor’s council, and burgesses, over and make a hotdog fold, creasing off center and leaving a tab, so that the title “The General Assembly 1619” can be seen.
- Cut on the dotted lines between the three groups, creating 3 tabs.
- Lift each tab and write details about each group underneath. Add drawings for additional meaning if desired.
- Refer to the information included below for additional background knowledge on this topic.

The Information below is included to build teacher background knowledge about the General Assembly and the House of Burgesses, and to clarify page 12 of the Curriculum Framework as well as information found in textbooks.

The Great Charter in 1618 authorized the popular election of representatives to advise the Governor (appointed at that time by the Virginia Company and after 1625 by the King) and Council (about a dozen prominent planters who served as advisors, appointed by the king.) These representatives were called "burgesses" and they served in the General Assembly. This truly was a general assembly, with governor, councilors, and burgesses meeting together as a group. There was no separate body composed of burgesses alone. Over the years, these three entities developed institutional identities and, in 1643, that separation was recognized. The Council was the upper house in the General Assembly and the burgesses formed the lower house, or House of Burgesses. The House of Burgesses was still an advisory group with little power, but over the next 125 years, it would grow in stature and prominence.
